THE SETTLEMENT.

The first man to penetrate the thick forest and inhospitable marsh which once covered the whole of this township, was Peter Stultz. He was soon after followed by his brother, Henry Stultz. They were natives of New Jersey, and emigrated to Ohio about 1808. They settled in Franklin county where they remained until 1828. That year Peter, first, and then Henry, erected cabins and removed their families to Muskallonge, near the bridge on the Greenesburg pike. They were not, however, left long to the solitary enjoyment of forest life. Others soon followed their trail and pushed even further into the uninviting wilds, to the banks of Mud Creek. The creek lands were dryest, and consequently were the first chosen. Gilbreath Stewart was the probable builder of the third cabin. He located near the Mud Creek bridge, on the Greenesburg pike. There was at that time no road in the township. Settlers made their way through the woods as best they could, now and then cutting down a tree where it was impossible to get between. In the winter of 1828 the county commissioners, on the petition of Henry Stultz, granted a public road from Muskallonge to Chamber's mill on the Sandusky River. This road was cut through that winter, the logs and brush being used to bridge the swamp. Henry Stultz erected on his lot a saw-mill. This was a high water mill, the water in Muskallonge during most of the year not being sufficient to drive the machinery.

The Stultz family remained but about five years, and from here removed to Indiana. These two brothers had been leading citizens.

In the spring of 1829, David Klotz* removed his family from Bedford county, Pennsylvania, and came to this township, John Garn being one of the party. After remaining at Chamber's mill, on the river, about one week, they followed the westward trail, passed the Stultz improvement, and finally arrived at the cabin of Gilbreath Stewart, where they were received until a cabin was completed. In the course of a couple of weeks the log frame was covered, and the family, consisting of five persons, moved in. No chimney had yet been built, and the cooking was done on the outside, except in rainy weather, when smoke was left to find its way through the cracks in the sides and roof.

David Vernon moved to this township in the fall of 1829, and his son-in-law, Mr. Campbell, immediately set to work to make an improvement. Mr. Vernon was a retired Scotch merchant, a bred gentleman, and stood high in the regard of the early citizens of Lower Sandusky, where he lived for a time. An incident once occurred in Olmsted's store which shows that the spirit of Puritan Scotland had not forsaken him, even in this wicked border town. Judge Howland, a man habitually profane in conversation, became provoked, and swore terribly. As soon as Howland had left the group, Vernon, then a late immigrant, with an expression of surprise and indignation, enquired:

"Da you cawl that mon Judge?"

On being informed that that was his office, the high bred Scot continued:

"Indade, saire, and you mak' such mon judge in this America! In Scotland, saire, they wud scarcely allow him to ba a wetness."

It is said that when the family were moving to this township they stopped at the Klotz cabin, where an interesting situation of affairs can be imagined. The Scotch people made several enquiries which the good Dutch people of that home were unable to understand. After enthusiastic gesticulation on both sides, an understanding was finally arrived at. A bountiful supper was spread, and although the guests could not understand their hosts, or the contrary, their friendship became mutual. The Vernons were all good people, but unfortunate. Sickness afflicted them and two of them died. A small lot was set apart for a

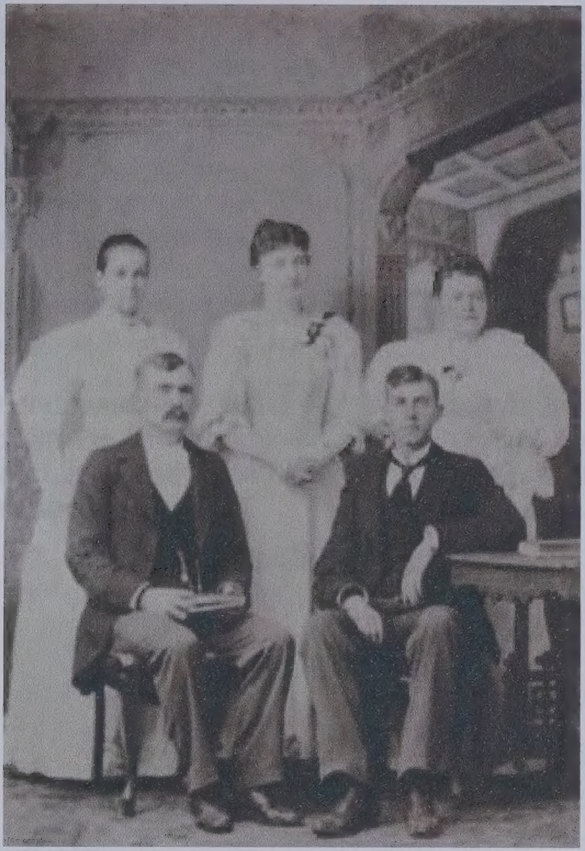
GRACE ADAIR HUNT



CLASS OF 1894

OCTOBER 5, 1876 - JUNE 30, 1945

Grace Adair, eldest daughter of Charles S. and Mary Gardner Adair, was born in the John Brown cabin on the home farm one mile west of Osawatomie, and grew to young womanhood there.

She attended school here and was a member of the first class to graduate from the Osawatomie High School, completing the high school work in 1894. She then worked in the office of the Remington Lumber company operated by her uncle, J. B. Remington; after ten years there she went to Kansas City, Mo. to the C. J. Carter lumber company where she worked as chief bookkeeper for 37 years, finishing her work there some three years ago.

She gave unfailing devotion and tender care to her aged aunt, Anna Gardner, who preceded her in death just six weeks ago.

Mrs. Hunt passed away at her home on the old homestead in the early morning of June 30, 1945.

The funeral service was held at the Eddy Funeral Home on Tuesday, July 3, with Rev. Max Barnes of the Methodist Church, officiating and Rev. W.C. Burton, pastor of the First Congregational Church of Kansas City, Mo., assisting him. Heaven will be richer for her presence, and earth will long be blessed by the memory of her gracious life.

She was a member of the P.E.O. Sisterhood, the Mercy Hospital League, the Monday Club, and enjoyed the homey work of the Indianapolis Farm Bureau Unit.

Mrs. Hunt was deeply religious, as a small child she was taken to Sunday School and church by her grandfather, the Rev. S.L. Adair, who was the pioneer pastor in this part of the newly settled country. She worked enthusiastically in the Sunday School department of the Congregational Church held in the Old Stone Church which still stands on North Sixth Street in Osawatomie. After going to Kansas City she was affiliated with the Presbyterian Church, later transferring her membership to the First Congregational Church there.

On June 20, 1914, she was married to M. J. Hunt, who, with a brother, Walter B. Adair, of Russelville, Ky., survive her.

Mrs. Hunt was richly endowed with all the gracious attributes of womanhood; patience, sincerity, tolerance and kindness were the ways of her daily life, no word of criticism or condemnation passed her lips, her faith in God was staunch in time of adversity as in time of security.

WOMEN OF NOTE.

A Miami County Educator.

Some of us get the idea that for one to deserve the name of an educator he or she, should reach eminence in some institution such as the University of Kansas. Not so. Webster defines an educator to be "one who educates." To educate is "to form and regulate the principles and character; to prepare and fit for any calling or business by systematic instruction; to develop and cultivate, whether physically, mentally or morally, but more commonly limited to the mental activities and senses." Within the scope of this definition, there has lived in this county a girl, whose hair has now gathered the snows of woman's winters, and she has made her mark among the teachers. No history of Miami county schools would be complete were the name of Miss Anna Gardner, of Osawatomie, left out.

Reared in the country, north of the river that touches Osawatomie, Miss Gardner learned in early life the tasks inquires back. If she finds out that there has been a mother upon one side or the other who had read some or traveled or it comes to her that the father, perhaps a great grandfather, had studied books and faces, to broaden his mind, then tasks of more weight may be given the pupil. Abraham Lincoln's immediate parents were of the lowly and uneducated, but away back of them was a developed and educated strain of blood in the lineage. Abraham bred from away back. Brightness of mind has been known to skip two generations and come out in the third. These are the things that the successful educator studies and the woman is the best educator. Nature gives to her what it doesn't give to man, intuition. She can tell more about the ancestry of a child by talking with it and looking it over than a man can by research and inquiry. In all of this Miss Gardner has been proficient and this accounts for her worth in the ancestry of a child by talking with it and looking it over than a man can by research and inquiry. In all of this Miss Gardner has been proficient and this accounts for her worth in the realm of education.

For many years Miss Gardner has been at the head of one department or another in the Osawatomie schools and now she is practically at the top. She may not have the control of all, but she is unsurpassed in knowledge of what is required of the teacher. She has not become a writer of history, nor fiction, nor rhymes. None of her ideas has been dramatized nor has she founded any college or given the world any seminary to bear her name, yet she has done equally as much. She has done her part well—has ever done the rightful thing nearest to her to do.

Reared in the country, north of the river that touches Osawatomie, Miss Gardner learned in early life the tasks and the exercise of patience that go with days on the farm. Her parents had the average share of worldly goods but this average share in Kansas in those days was small indeed. Opportunities for education were few in the years of her first and second reader experiences. Facilities were not at hand then as they are now. Of course, what was lacking in these directions was made up in another. The prairies were not marred by roads and fences. In the spring the green fields rose and fell like the ocean's waves. The wild flowers were more numerous and the landscape had the charms of the wild. The pathway to the nearest school house, often three to four miles distant, was bedecked on either side with the bounteous bloom of a primitive country. Nor is this going back so far as to place Anna Gardner to be counted among the old. Thirty-five years ago there was more open prairie within among the old. Thirty-five years ago there was more open prairie within sight of the state asylum on the hill than now could be viewed within a four days' run in a motor car, going westward at that.

It was in the latter part of the 1870 decade that Miss Gardner began teaching. There was nothing brilliant in her work to begin with, but she so ingratiated herself into the minds of observant pupils that one term in any district created a demand for a second. There was nothing of what the world calls the genius in her makeup, but she accomplished by steady effort that which the passing judgment of men often ascribes to genius. She taught and pupils, under her direction, learned. She kept order without effort. Boys ahead of their years in body and behind their years in mind, who went to school in the winter because they had nothing else to do, soon caught the spirit of learning and of books from her methods and her manner. learned. She kept order without effort. Boys ahead of their years in body and behind their years in mind, who went to school in the winter because they had nothing else to do, soon caught the spirit of learning and of books from her methods and her manner. In short, many "who went to scoff remained to pray."

In teachers' institutes, Miss Gardner was a leader. In calisthenics there was about her an air of modesty and a thorough knowledge of the human body that made her a leader. In mathematics she was authority and in the use of language she had a simple method in which she displayed the taste of a critical judge. And in all the other branches there proceeded from her well stored mind a current of substantial information to all who would listen or observe.

It is one thing to possess information and another thing to impart it. Miss Gardner's strength in both know-

It is one thing to possess information and another thing to impart it Miss Gardner's strength in both knowledge and the faculty of giving it out has made her an educator. It is not how much but how well. Books form only a part of the sources of her information. She gathered sermons from stones and running brooks; she knows the value and the force of song; the power of a pleasant word; the bent of the human mind in maturer years as well as in youthful days, and she knows the capacity of the intellect. A child without educated ancestry somewhere in the line on back can easily be overtasked and overschooled. You can't take a boy or girl whose parentage back for one hundred years has been a monotonous line of ignorance, and push that boy or that girl suddenly to the heights of learning. George W. Hilton Great Lakes Carferries

May 14. She was sponsored jointly by four young ladies, Bella, Lilly and Eliza Jenking and Ella Caldwell. Together they released a bottle of wine suspended from the deck of the ferry and christened her. The ship was said to be a great source of pride to Jenking, who had designed her as well as supervised construction.

The Transfer (I) was 244 long overall, and 75 feet wide over the guards. She had pilot houses fore and aft, and rudders at both ends of the hull. She had metal sheathing of 1/8" to 3/16" where she was exposed to the ice. She made her trial run in June, 1873, and entered service toward the end of July.

Within a year and a half, the Transfer (I) encountered the worst winter in local history. February, 1875, is the coldest month in the recorded history of the Detroit weather bureau, which has data reaching back to 1871. The other winter months were nearly as severe. By the middle of January, the Canada Southern was unable to maintain the ferry schedule, and had to route livestock via the Great Western crossing at Sarnia. Toward the end of the month, the company tried blasting the ice with gunpowder and nitroglycerine. In February, the ferry broke a rudder in the ice, and in an effort to return to Stony Island, where she was maintained, she became fast in heavy pack ice. There she remained for two weeks, while freight was either drawn across on sleighs or sent via Sarnia. A relief ferry, believed to have been the Great Western's Michigan (I), came down the river to try to maintain service, but she failed to do so. The railway, badly disorganized by the interruption in service, considered tunneling the river, but such a project was too advanced for the times.

Traffic was growing steadily. By January, 1878, the Transfer (I) was averaging 35 trips per day, carrying both passenger and freight trains. In April, 1878, a telephone cable was laid under the river to aid Detroit River for more than a half century.

A second slip had been built on the Ontario side when TRANSPORT appeared in 1880, but the Amherstburg crossing suffered from a geographical handicap. The direct route to Chicago of which it was to be a part had never been completed, and it was some 16 miles below the center of population in Detroit and Windsor. The Grand Trunk's absorption of the Great Western in 1882 put the Canada Southern at a competitive disadvantage by bringing its principal rival into Windsor. As if to demonstrate the operating handicaps at Amherstburg, TRANSFER (I) went aground for a full day at Stony Island in August, 1882. The Canada Southern Railway in 1882 and 1883 built a line from Essex to Windsor to provide a connection with the Michigan Central at Detroit. In 1883, the Canada Southern was absorbed by the Michigan Central, and on December 31, 1883, the Michigan Central opened a ferry crossing between Detroit and Windsor. Slips were placed at the foot of 9th Street, Detroit, and Cameron Street in Windsor. This became the company's principal crossing, and Amherstburg was used mainly (or only) when ice interfered with operations at Windsor.

The new arrangement created a great increase in traffic, and in 1884, the company took delivery of a new iron ferry, similar to the TRANSPORT, MICHIGAN CENTRAL. The new boat was also built by Detroit Dry Dock at Wyandotte. All of the Michigan Central ferries had three tracks.

In 1888, the TRANSFER (I) was condemned as unseaworthy and the Michigan Central closed the Amherstburg crossing permanently. In the same year the railroad placed in service a new car ferry of the same name, TRANSFER (II). The new ship was built and engined by the Cleveland Ship Building Company. She had the first steel hull among Great Lakes car ferries. She was one of the few ships ever propelled with both paddle wheels and a screw; the great Victorian Atlantic liner Great Eastern is the principle example of such propulsion. TRANSFER (II) had 27'-6" wheels, weighing 66 tons each. Each was driven by two 28" x 48" cylinders in the hull through a 16-foot cog wheel, in the same fashion as on the TRANSPORT. In addition, TRANSFER (II) had a 9'-6" propeller at the stern, driven by a pair of 28" x 36" cylinders acting on a shaft 10 inches in diameter and 52 feet long. The shaft was slightly inclined so that the screw projected about a foot below the hull, where it was protected by a cast iron guard, part of the rudder housing. The reason for this odd arrangement was the nature of the ice-breaking required at Detroit. The ice in the Detroit River is typically pack ice against which the usual method of ice breaking, bringing the bow forward on the sheet ice until the weight of the ship breaks the ice, is inappropriate. Since the Detroit River car ferries spend about half their passages backing, the propeller on TRANSFER (II) was useful in breaking up

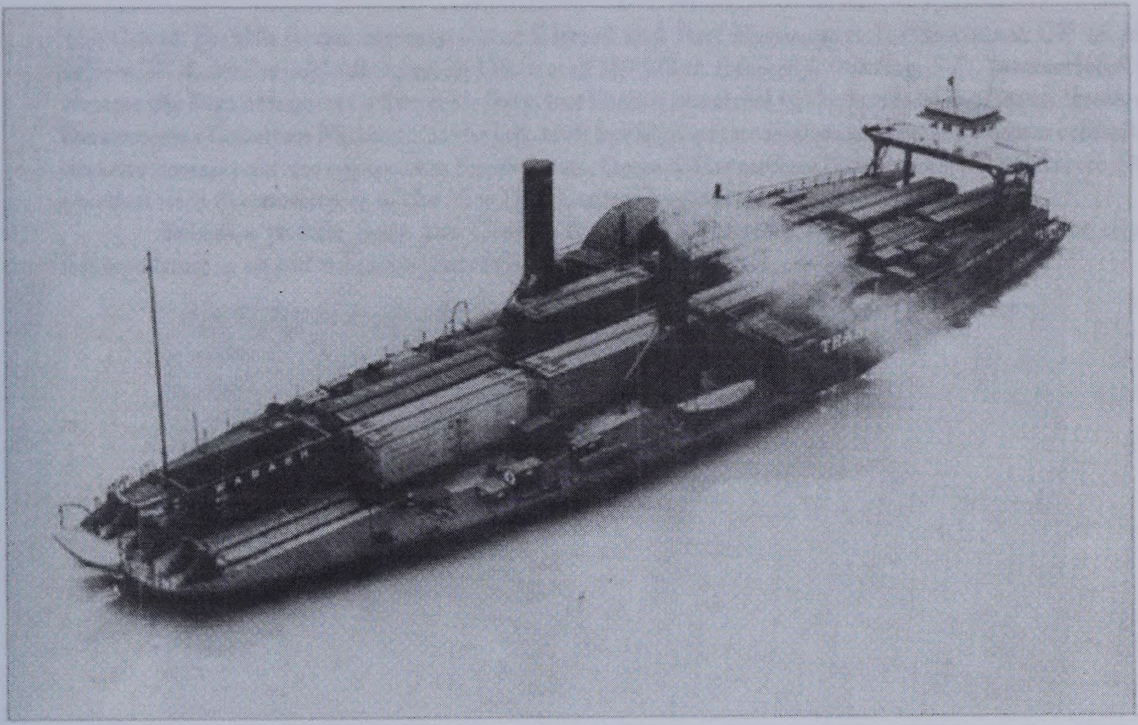
CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

Following completion of the transcontinental railway, the Canadian government pursued a policy of encouraging the Canadian Pacific, by sudsidies and otherwise, to expand in Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritime Provinces. The Dominion government apparently wished to create competition for the Grand Trunk, which dominated the railroad network of eastern Canada. This policy has been severely criticized, for the Grand Trunk had never been particularly profitable, and the diversion of traffic weakened it greatly, combining with other factors to ruin it financially, driving it eventually into government ownership.

The Canadian Pacific's expansion in 1889 took the form of two big projects, building the railway's present International of Maine Divison for access to the Atlantic at St. John, New Brunswick, and building a line into Detroit from London. Both were efforts of the Canadian Pacific to participate in movements between Chicago and the Atlantic ports, and particularly to attract traffic from the Grand Trunk's main line from Chicago to Portland, Maine. The London-Detroit line, in fact, was projected to run parallel to the Grand Trunk's own route, the former Great Western Railway main line into Windsor. The Grand Trunk, as might be expected, looked upon the parallel line as grossly unwarranted, and opposed its construction. Being unable to prevent it, the Grand Trunk next offered the Canadian Pacific trackage rights, but the CPR refused and undertook construction of a line of 112 miles, almost all within sight of the Grand Trunk.

Track-laying was completed within the last few days of 1889, and at the end of the year the line was opened for freight service. car ferry operation was envisioned to reach Detroit, and a slip had been built by the time the tracks were completed. A second slip was reported projected for completion in 1890. The Canadian Pacific ordered two steel paddlers to provide the service, MICHIGAN (II) and ONTARIO. Both were launched in 1890, MICHIGAN (II) by F. W. Wheeler & Company of Bay City, Michigan, and ONTARIO by the Polson Iron Works at Owen Sound, Ontario. The ships were the largest car ferries yet put in service on the Detroit River, and the MICHIGAN (II) remained the largest paddle ferry in length and tonnage ever to serve on the Great Lakes. Both were built along the general lines of the LANSDOWNE, loading from the bow, but having pilot houses fore and aft. Each of the ferries had a capacity of 16 cars on two-track decks, and required about a half hour to load, make the crossing and unload. They ran mainly, although not exclusively, to the Wabash Railway slip in Detroit, a distance of about a mile.

In 1906, the Canadian Pacific boats were reported to be ferrying about 200 freight cars per day



WABASH

The Grand Trunk's ferries between Point Edward and Port Huron were INTERNATIONAL (II) of 1872 (above, W. A. McDonald collection) and HURON of 1875 (left, Edward J. Dowling, S.J.). International (II) became the Pere Marquette's first river ferry, but HURON remained in the hands of the Grand Trunk and the successor Canadian National. At the left, with her high-pressure non-condensing engines exhausting into the summer air, she approaches Brush Street, Detroit. Her ancient lines, barely changed since 1875, contrast with the modernity of the New York Central baggage car she is carrying.

Below, a paddle ferry, the Canada Southern's TRANSFER (I) of 1873, loads at her slip in Amherstburg in an old woodcut (Fort Malden Museum).

MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD

In 1873, six years after the Great Western Railway brought car ferriage to the Detroit River, a predecessor of the Michigan Central Railroad initiated what was to be the most extensive of all the river ferry services. The company was the Canada Southern Railway, which was being built by the Vanderbilt interests as an effort to establish a direct line from Suspension Bridge, at Niagara Falls, to Chicago. The financial panic of 1873 caused the line to terminate at Fayette, Ohio, about one hundred miles southwest of Detroit. Its crossing of the Detroit River was constructed by a subsidiary, optimistically named the Canada Southern Bridge Company, organized in 1873. The Bridge Company's line ran east from Slocum junction, near Trenton, Michigan, across a fourspan bridge over the west channel of the Detroit River to Grosse Ile, thence over a second bridge to Stony Island, on which a ferry slip was built. The opposite slip was built at Gordon, Ontario, 1.2 miles north of Amherstburg. The Canada Southern Bridge Company never bridged the main channel of the Detroit River, but operated for 15 years with car ferries.

The company's first car ferry was a wooden side-wheeler, TRANSFER (I), built at Walkerville by Henry Jenking in the same year as the Great Western's MICHIGAN (I). The ship was slightly smaller than the MICHIGAN (I), but she had three tracks and a capacity of 21 cars. She is reported to have had arch frames. The railway hoped to have her in service by January 1, 1873, but she was not ready for launching until May 14. She was sponsored jointly by four young ladies, Bella, Lilly and Eliza Jenking and Ella Caldwell. Together they released a bottle of wine suspended from the deck of the ferry and christened her. The ship was said to be a great source of pride to Jenking, who had designed her as well as supervised construction.

The TRANSFER (I) was 244 long overall, and 75 feet wide over the guards. She had pilot houses fore and aft, and rudders at both ends of the hull. She had metal sheathing of $^{1}/_{8}$" to $^{3}/_{16}$" where she was exposed to the ice. She made her trial run in June, 1873, and entered service toward the end of July.

Within a year and a half, the TRANSFER (I) encountered the worst winter in local history. February, 1875, is the coldest month in the recorded history of the Detroit weather bureau, which has data reaching back to 1871. The other winter months were nearly as severe. By the middle of January, the Canada Southern was unable to maintain the ferry schedule, and had to route livestock via the Great Western crossing at Sarnia. Toward the end of the month, the company tried blasting the ice with gunpowder and nitroglycerine. In February, the ferry broke a rudder in the ice, and in an effort to return to Stony Island, where she was maintained, she became fast in heavy pack ice. There she remained for two weeks, while
